Description: This two-story Craftsman house is largely original. The entry porch is located on the southern side of the street façade and is sheltered by the second floor, which is supported by a single large square wood-cased column. The entry stairs are non-original and have lost their original framed stair cheeks. The northern side of the street façade has a gable bay. The gable end has a projecting balcony with a guardrail with balusters. The house is sheathed with horizontal bevel siding on the main floor with shingles and stucco on the gable end. The eaves and bargeboards are supported by knee brackets.

Cultural Data: On January 22, 1926, a very sobering ad appeared in the Seattle Times: "Children boarded; comfortable home, best of care; $20/month." One can only surmise that this was a win-win situation born of heartbreaking necessity: those who could not take care of their children in the years leading up to the Great Depression relying on the care of those who needed to find a way to supplement their income. Charles McCoy (1891-1978) was an electrician at a shipyard.
