Description: This one-story hip roof Colonial Revival house originally had a recessed entry on the norther side of the street façade that has now been filled in with an entry doorway with sidelights. There is a small attic gable dormer above the doorway. A group of four eight-light wood casement windows has also been replaced by three nine-over-one double-hung windows. The southern façade has a large gable roof with a central brick masonry chimney that intersects with the hip roof. The house is sheathed with horizontal bevel siding

Cultural Data: This house was for sale numerous times in the early half of the 20th Century. In spite of the number of owners, they left behind few clues as to their lives. We do know, however, that Ben Barrows, a plumber, received high praise for his work from insurance magnate A. P. Merrill, whose new downtown high-rise ("home for tenants of the highest type") was graced by Barrows' plumbing fixtures.
