Description: This one-and-a-half-story Colonial Revival bungalow has a central projecting shallow arched entry porch roof supported on a pair of Tuscan Columns. The central entry doorway is flanked by two large wood-sash 12-over-one double-hung windows. The gable end has a pair of original 12-light wood-sash casement windows. The house is sheathed with horizontal bevel siding and all roofs have eave returns. Gable dormers have been added to both the northern and southern sides of the roof.

Cultural Data: Arthur D. Barrall (1878-1943) was the Secretary/Treasurer of a wood preserving company. Charles Olson was a bookkeeper for the West Coast Wood Preserving Company. Hand-forged nails purportedly made by this outfit have been found in bridges in California, Washington and Montana. The nails are distinguished by a factory-stamped "WC," followed by a hand-stamped letter/number combination that indicated the type of wood used for the bridge. WCWP operated two plants in the early part of the 20th Century: one at Eagle Harbor, WA (built in 1906); and the other one at Seattle (built 1912). [Source: <http://nailhunter.com/wc.htm>]
