Description: This one-story intersecting gables Colonial Revival bungalow has a central clipped side gable roof flanked by and intersecting a pair of projecting clipped front gable roofs creating a recessed entry partially sheltered by an original trellis. The side wings each have a wood-sash tripartite window. The house is sheathed with horizontal bevel siding and the eaves and bargeboards are supported by wood corbels.

Cultural Data: Natalie Brodskaya Notkin (1900-1970), was born in Russia and immigrated to the U.S. in 1921. She married James B. Notkin, a mechanical engineer. Natalie was employed as a librarian in the Seattle Public Library's Russia collection. In 1930, Natalie was accused of spreading Communist propaganda by purchasing books by Tolstoy and Gorky from the Soviet Union. In spite of her protests she was fired but went on to a prestigious career with Suzzallo Library at the University of Washington.
