Description: This two-story rectangular house has a clipped gable roof and a hip roof "aeroplane" second floor. The angled entry is located on the house's northeastern corner and is sheltered by low-slope gable roof. The eastern façade has a tripartite window group on the southern portion and a pair of corner windows on the norther corner. A basement garage door is located below the tripartite window. Gable roofs have full eave returns. The house is sheathed with horizontal bevel siding.

Cultural Data: Hiram Martin Chittenden, Jr. (1894-1971), was the oldest son of Brig. General Hiram M. Chittenden (1858-1917), an engineer for whom the Government Locks in Seattle are named. Chittenden's widow, Nettie (1856-1947), was living in this house with two of her children in 1920. The house passed on to Hiram M. Chittenden, Jr. in 1941. He became a professor at the University of Washington.
